Ryan represents project developers, independent power producers, and large energy consumers in regulatory proceedings, transactional matters, and state and federal trial and appellate courts. He helps clients navigate complicated and ever-changing energy market rules and advocates for clients before state and local regulators.

Prior to rejoining ArentFox Schiff, Ryan served as a Staff Attorney in the Trial Division at the Illinois Commerce Commission, where he gained significant experience litigating public utility commission proceedings involving electric, gas, water, and telephone companies. He participated in several of the first docketed proceedings to implement the Illinois Climate and Equitable Jobs Act (CEJA) as well as high profile utility ethics investigations.

Client Work

- Advises developers of wind, solar, and energy storage facilities regarding state and local permitting and zoning processes.
- Represents the developer of an interstate carbon dioxide pipeline in contested certification proceedings before the Illinois Commerce Commission.
- Counsels renewable energy developers with compliance and regulatory issues related to Illinois Power Agency utility-scale renewable energy credit (REC) procurements and community solar REC procurements under the Illinois Shines/Adjustable Block Program.
- Represents municipal utilities in negotiating a power purchase agreement (PPA) with a large solar facility.
- Helped two pipeline companies win public utility commission approval to expand their capacity.
- Second-chaired the firm's representation of electric generators in a state coal ash rulemaking, helped win dismissal of a federal water pollution suit, and successfully defended that dismissal on appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.
- Helped plan and execute challenges to new Clean Air Act rules in federal appellate court, resulting in a stay and eventual reconsideration of the rules.
